Art Versus Science ... or is it Spanish??

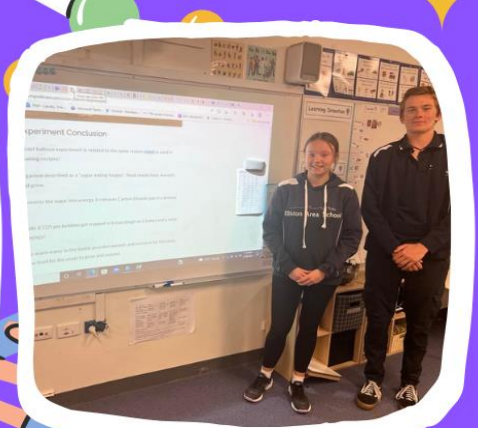

As part of Science Week, Students at EAS discovered the non-porous properties of glass through experimenting with mono-printing. This is a process where paint is applied to a non-porous surface such as glass or acetate sheets (thick transparent plastic sheets used for printing) and then a single print taken off the glass with lithograph paper. The effect is a textured print which can then be used for mixed media artwork.

R/1 students used their mono-prints to learn the Spanish names for marine and desert animals and create mixed media art using black markers or collage.
